6 whole character of his judgement⁴¹ Fourthly, the best type of report is one which indicates,
7 the arguments of counsel and sets out the judgment, or relevant portion of it, verbatim. A 8 report which only summaries the judgment should only be used in the absence of a fuller
9 report, but may not even then carry much weight⁴² Finally in the absence of all else the oral 10 account of a case by a barrister is admissible, though again this may be of limited value.⁴³

11 Application of precedents

12 A precedent influences future decision. Every decision is pronounced on a specific set of 13 past facts and from the decision on those facts a rule has to be extracted and projected into 14 the future. No one can foresee, the precise situations that will arise, so that rule has to be 15 capable of applying to a range of broadly similar situations against a background of changing 16 conditions. It has therefore to be in general terms and 'malleable'. As pointed out at the 17 beginning of the book, no word has one proper meaning, nor can anyone see to fix the 18 meaning of words for others, so that interpretation of the rule remain flexible and opened⁴⁴

20 Applying a precedent to the instant case is a process of matching the fact -pattern of the 21 precedent and the ruling thereon with the fact-pattern of the instant case; if they match, the 22 rule is applied, if not, it is distinguished. This involves the first two kinds of knowledge 23 mentioned at the start of this chapter, namely, knowing the facts and knowing the law
24 applicable to those facts.

25 Knowing the facts

26 | Knowing the facts of the instant case involves an exercise of discretion. This lies initially 27 in believing or disbelieving the testimony of witnesses and weighing it on a balance of 28 probability. Judges are human, so the quirks of individual personalities may also play some 29 part occasionally.⁴⁵ The discretionary element is most significant in knowing how to state the 30 facts, for, as pointed out in Chapter 14⁶, it is not knowledge of facts, but knowledge of how to 31 state facts that is relevant; and this applies to the statement of facts of both the instant and the
